Exercises after having neck dissection surgery

We have given you this factsheet because you have had neck dissection surgery. This factsheet contains some exercises to do to help improve your range of movement after your surgery. We hope it will help to answer some of the questions you may have. If you have any further questions or concerns, please speak to a member of our head and neck therapy team using the details at the end of this factsheet.

Why do I need to do these exercises?

These exercises are designed to help with your recovery after having neck dissection surgery. They focus on improving your range of movement (the extent or limit to which a part of your body can be moved or stretched) and strength.

When should I start doing these exercises?

We have included the table below to explain when to start doing these exercises.

Days after your surgery	Exercises
0 to 4	Do not do any exercises.
5 to 9	Start doing the exercises in a slow and controlled manner throughout the day. You should be able to complete these exercises without experiencing any pain. If you experience any pain while doing an exercise, stop doing it and move on to a different exercise.
10+	The exercises should begin to feel easier, and you should find you can move further, back to your normal range of movement, without any pain.

How often should I do these exercises?

We recommend doing these exercises three times a day.

Are there any risks?

You may find these exercises uncomfortable to begin with, but this will improve over time. It is important not to push through pain in the early stages of your recovery, but equally important that you try some to aid your recovery. If you experience any pain, stop doing the exercises and speak to your doctor at your follow-up clinic appointment.
